Photo Courtesy: @Upwork/Twitter With approximately 690 million users and counting, LinkedIn leaves little doubt that it is the world's largest social networking website for professionals. LinkedIn offers huge advantages for job seekers by using its many features to help people build their careers, market their brand, showcase their skills and look for job opportunities. However, there are those who may lack the time to invest to create and maintain a LinkedIn presence but still want to find jobs online. For those job seekers, the following LinkedIn alternatives may provide a faster way to find work.UpworkThe COVID-19 pandemic has caused a surge in job searches for work-from-home jobs. Upwork, formerly oDesk, is one of the most established online freelancing platforms, with millions of registered freelancers, project managers, hiring agents and recruiters. For years now, Upwork has connected job seekers with employers for both short-term and long-term projects, most of which can be accomplished remotely. Approximately 3 million new job opportunities are available on Upwork annually, which makes it the biggest online freelancing platform in the world.Photo Courtesy: @Upwork/Twitter IndeedIndeed is the largest job search website in the United States, surpassing another entry on this list in 2010. Unlike Upwork, which provides a hiring and working platform, Indeed is essentially a search engine that crawls job listings from various websites, job boards, company career pages, job classifieds and staffing companies. The revenue of this website primarily comes from offering premium job postings and resumes to companies that are hiring. Since 2010, the company has included a feature that allows job seekers to post their resumes and apply directly to jobs that are posted on the site.Photo Courtesy: @indeed/Twitter ZipRecruiterZipRecruiter works much like LinkedIn in the sense that it serves as a hub where job seekers can upload their resumes and where potential employers and hiring agents post job openings. Among the useful features of this website are user-modifiable settings that allow you to search for listings that match your skill set, preferences and experience automatically. The website uses advanced algorithms that help match job seekers with potential employers.Photo Courtesy: @ZipRecruiterCEO/Twitter MyOpportunityLike ZipRecruiter, MyOpportunity uses advanced algorithms to help provide job seekers with the best employment opportunities. MyOpportunity claims to have 5 million members, and the site does its best to help prospective employees and hiring managers alike, and the MyOpportunity app makes it easy to keep an eye out for new leads. You can even get notifications based on new locations in your area.Photo Courtesy: @opportunity/Twitter LetsLunchAs its name suggests, LetsLunch sets up job seekers with potential employers for a face-to-face meeting, which may or may not be over lunch. LetsLunch runs on the premise that job hirings are mostly successful after the face-to-face meetings of job seekers and potential employers. According to the website, the app's primary intention is to pull people away from their keyboards at lunch and engage them in business networking sessions in person. LetsLunch claims to have set up over 100,000 professional lunch meetups.Photo Courtesy: @LetsLunch/Twitter GlassdoorOne of the factors that make Glassdoor stand out is a feature that lets current and former employees review and rate their companies anonymously. In addition to providing reviews and ratings, these workers can also reveal current or past salary rates, incentives and bonuses. That in turn provides job seekers with information that can help them narrow down their job search. Glassdoor also has the same tools as many other job posting sites, including a job search engine that filters job openings by category, location and specific job descriptions.Photo Courtesy: @Glassdoor/Twitter MonsterFor more than two decades, Monster has evolved from just a job board to becoming the world's most comprehensive online resources for employment opportunities, talent management, career building and recruitment. Although Indeed overtook it as the industry leader in 2010, this site is still a hit among job seekers. What it lacks in professional networking features, it makes up for with its powerful and straightforward approach to connecting workers with jobs. The website also provides tons of useful articles, including tips about job hunting, resume composition, acing job interviews, finding real talent, asking for a pay raise and switching employers and careers.@monsterjobs/Twitter MORE FROM QUESTIONSANSWERED.NET No jobs found for your search. Please Register as a Tutor so students can contact you directly. Creativa Images/Shutterstock The internet is one of the greatest technological advancements in job searching. Just 20 years ago finding jobs had to be done at job fairs or by reading newspapers. Now, logging on and checking out job postings is the new norm. With the internet, not only can you find a job but you can find the career of your dreams. By doing the job search right, you can have years of happy and fulfilling employment.Job Posting SitesJob posting sites are currently the most popular way to apply for jobs online. With these websites, finding and applying for jobs you are interested in is very easy. On most sites you can sort by city, salary and qualifications. Once you find jobs you qualify for you can send your resume and apply in the click of a button. However, this is a downside to job posting sites. Because of the ease of use, many employers get hundreds of applications for a single position. While you may be the one they pick, it's important to explore other jobs through other means to get employed as soon as possible.Classified Ad SitesClassified ads are one of the original places to find jobs online and they are still going strong. Most of the times classified ads are posted directly from employers who are seeking someone quickly. This is great for you as the whole process of being interviewed and employed will most likely be very fast. There is also a more personal touch on these sites and there aren't as many applicants as on job posting sites. Be sure to remember that the first message or email you send is important, as first impressions count. There are many classified ad websites out there to check when in the market for a job.Social MediaSocial media is one of the most interesting ways to find a job using the internet. Thanks to these platforms, you can find out if a page or business you like has a job opening. On professional social networking websites you can use your connections to find out about job openings before anyone else. So if you're in the market for a job, getting in touch with your professional connections can lead to a new job even if nothing is advertised yet. Always check with your connections first, as not only will you have a personal reference to get a foot in the door, but you will hardly have any competition as the position might not even been advertised yet.Company WebsitesIf there is a specific company you want to work for, be sure to check out their official website. Many times these companies will have a 'Jobs' or 'Careers' link at the very bottom of the site. Check it out to see if there are any jobs you're interested in. These jobs are usually competitive but have fewer applicants. Many employers also appreciate applying directly on the website as opposed to a job board. To apply always include a cover letter and your resume so you can get a chance for an interview.Online NewspapersWhile newspapers are becoming a thing of the past, many papers have online sections that allow employers to post jobs. Newspapers have always been the means of finding jobs until the internet came around and many employers still prefer this method. The reason they do this is to get a better chance at finding someone local and who may be familiar with their business. Due to the decreased popularity, these jobs have few applicants which increases your chances at getting employed. However, only few employers still do these ads, so you may not have as many options, but it's still important to consider.
